

The Labyrinth Unbound: Weblogs as Literature

Comments

Weblog is one of the most subversive medium in any literary form peppered with the lives of Viennese villages and Antipodean country towns.

As Vaclav Havel observed about the promise of grassroots politics and daring theatre plays: Hope is the ability to work for something just because it is right, whether it stands a chance of succeeding or not.

Creating weblogs is tied up with some dangers, but the unedited voice of one ordinary voice is worth more than the ocean of indifference behind the s(i)x figure publishing advances ...(smile)

The young at heart get to be pioneers again. How often does any generation gets that opportunity twice?

The culture of winner takes all wanted the ordinary voices to be less visible, but it has ironically really promoted us by pulling the sign down.

Sole survivors might often be thought of as anonymous, but we never want to be voiceless. For example, without the weblog and its virtual word of mouth, there would be no Cold River: A Survivor's Story on the amazon.com (smile)

Posted by: Jozef at August 4, 2004 04:11 PM

Posting Policies

As with any scholarly publication, healthy, robust discussions are encouraged. However, we ask that you refrain from ad hominem attacks and profanity. The editors reserve the right to edit or delete any comment or trackback that violates these rules. In addition, we do not pass emails along to authors.

Comments and essays are the property of their authors. All other content ©Into the Blogosphere 2004.

Contributors agree by posting that any original content, including comments, copyright owned by them, unless otherwise stated, is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivs 2.0 license for others to use.