INTRODUCTION

Social science disciplines vary widely in the extent to which they contain scholarly knowledge on American Indians. Anthropology and history contain the most knowledge pertaining to American Indians, derived from their long traditions of scholarship focusing on American Indians. The other social sciences are far behind. Consequently our social science knowledge about American Indian peoples and their concerns is not balanced but biased by the disciplinary perspectives of anthropology and history. The likelihood that American society contains little realistic knowledge about contemporary American Indians in comparison to knowledge about traditional and historical American Indians is perhaps a function of this disciplinary imbalance.

This bibliography enumerates articles on American Indians published in the scholarly journals of history, sociology, geography, political science, economics, and American and ethnic studies through 1976. Articles in anthropology have been excluded from this bibliography because of the massive number of them and because they may be found in other, existing bibliographies. It has been compiled in an effort to both summarize existing social science knowledge on American Indians and facilitate the generation of new knowledge on American Indians in all of the various social sciences and related disciplines, but particularly in those which have in the past shown little interest in the study of American Indian peoples and societies.
