LEADERSHIP LETTER

From the Vice Chancellor

Thanksgiving has always been my favorite holiday. I love autumn, the harvest, the traditional foods I grew up eating for Thanksgiving dinner, and the concept of gratitude. Perhaps that is part of the reason I became so defensive when I first heard critiques of the was, though the tradition of meeting for diplomacy with area tribes came from the indigenous tribes of what is now Massachusetts.) And wasn't it a celebration of sharing food and giving thanks? (It was, though most of the food came from Native people as did the ritual of giving thanks for the harvest.) And didn't the Puritans live in peace with Native people? (They did at the moment of the celebration, though writings from the Puritans described indigenous people as wild men, they gave thanks when European diseases weakened tribes in the area, and they massacred more than 500 Wampanoags—adults and children—just 16 years after the first celebration.)

I still celebrate Thanksgiving, and it still may be my favorite holiday, but I am learning to broaden my traditions by taking time to be honest about the holiday and to celebrate it within the larger and more significant context of Native American History Month. For me, this includes moments of silence for countless atrocities, both deliberate and unintended, unleashed upon the indigenous people of the Americas by my ancestors, and acknowledging I live on the land of the Dakota, the Ojibwe, and other Native Nations.

It also involves creating time to learn from the rich culture and heritage of Native people. For example, we just finished celebrating Transgender Awareness Week. For most of us living in this region, we are just now learning to accept, value, and celebrate transgender people; to use pronouns based on how others identify rather than the boxes we place them in; and to move beyond binary definitions of gender. While there were variations across the diverse tribes of North American, most tribes celebrated “two spirit” individuals (a term encompassing transgender, intersex, and gay and lesbian identities), honored their unique gender identities, supported diverse sexual attractions, and looked to them to add to the overall work and community of the tribe. What we are just learning now, Native Americans have known for ages.

I encourage you to make time for honest gratitude this week, and I hope your gratitude involves considering the myriad ways in which you benefit from engaging in community with others whose cultures, identities, and lived experiences are different than your own.

Looking Ahead to Spring

Back in August, we noted the road to in-person instruction through Thanksgiving was narrow, it would be difficult to achieve, and we had just one chance to get it right. Thank you to everyone for your hard work to get us here! It has not been easy, but you did it!

Looking ahead to spring, the road to maintaining in-person instruction throughout the semester will again be narrow and challenging, but I believe we can do it. We may have to make some adjustments as we start and as we go, but know we are committed to December 21 and on January 4.

Guidance for Being Safe While Traveling and Celebrating Thanksgiving

As much as possible, we encourage you to forego travel for Thanksgiving and to limit the size of your celebrations in order to remain safe and prevent the spread of COVID-19.

International Travel

The restriction on all international travel for University business by students, faculty, and staff has been extended to March 31, 2021. However, faculty, staff, and graduate students may apply for an exception to the restriction. Domestic travel by staff or faculty using personal or fleet services vehicles continues to be allowed, but faculty and staff domestic air travel for University purposes is discouraged unless absolutely necessary.

While University-related international travel for undergraduates is currently not permitted, the University is monitoring conditions for travel to certain University-approved education abroad programs to determine whether this travel will be permitted prior to March 31, 2021.

We strongly encourage all who are considering travel, whether for work, study, or personal reasons, to explore the travel resources from the U.S. Department of State, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and your selected airline.

Feedback on the UMN “MPact 2025” Strategic Plan Metrics

In mid-October, President Gabel shared an update on the implementation of MPact 2025, our University's first systemwide strategic plan. On Friday, November 20, we received a request to secure feedback from faculty, student affairs educators, staff, and students on proposed metrics for the plan. Please take a few moments to complete a survey that includes information about the metrics and asks for your feedback. Click here to complete the survey. Note you will soon receive an email requesting your feedback, which will include a link to this same survey.

Student Success Center Feature

Minnesota Crookston Student Success Center Continues Inclusive Offerings during Pandemic. The University of Minnesota Crookston Student Success Center has had to make adjustments to their offerings due to the current environment we live in with the COVID-19 pandemic. But while their offerings have occurred in both in-person and virtual environments, the factor that hasn't changed is a commitment to inclusion to support all students at UMN Crookston.
