Revised Education System in Georgia Outlined by Beers

The development of a centralized university system in the state of Georgia that is attempting to raise the standard of higher education in the state through testing and measurement of students, a health program and community surveys was described to the last summer session convocation audience of the year yesterday in Northrop auditorium by F. Sturgis Beers, examiner and executive secretary of the Georgia system and a former University of Minnesota staff member.

Stressing the importance of the community surveys, Mr. Beers pointed out that a revision of the curricular content of the colleges in the state to include subjects of definite utility value to a particular area might be advisable. Some survey of the community needs should be made with reference to education in the state, he believes.

"It is held that a state university system, if it is to be of great service to the community, ought to concern itself with a careful study of community life, community needs and community potentialities. Such information as thus may be gathered should ideally be made to impinge upon curricular offerings and should be used in conjunction with the selection of students for special or general types of training," Mr. Beers declared.

"As a point of departure in this program, surveys were made last year of a sampled number of communities. In many instances the findings which resulted from such surveys were distressing in the extreme and strongly suggest that a revamping of education in the elementary and secondary levels is strongly needed."

In a community only ten miles from one of the state supported junior colleges, are to be found twenty-nine families with a total of one hundred and seventeen children. The heads of these families are listed occupationally thus: twenty farmers, eight laborers, one unemployed. These farmers have been in the community on an average of more than twenty-five years. Forty-eight per cent of the families are provided with no kind of toilet, only one home is screened, five of the families have no water supply on the premises. Only four magazines are subscribed for in the entire community. There is a total of 26 books in all the homes. Not a single family owns its own property. None is buying any property. Fourteen are renters; fifteen are share-croppers. Of the farmers, the entire farm equipment averages per family the munificent sum of four dollars."

One of the objectives of the generalized education system in Georgia is to find new outlets for services, the speaker pointed out. Already the possibilities of manufacturing rayon from pine pulp, the distilling of alcohol from low grade corn and the manufacture of newsprint paper from pine pulp have been advanced as possible new industries.
